

January 18th, 2009

The room is dark and is illuminated by one light source; a bare light bulb hanging from the ceiling. A photographer, naked man, and musician are all positioned equidistant from one another. The photographer is holding a Polaroid camera and is standing in the middle of the room. The naked man is standing to her right and is holding a blindfold in his left hand. The pianist is sitting at a piano to the left of the photographer.

The photographer nods at the pianist, and the pianist begins to play. The naked man takes the blindfold he is holding in his hand, and looking straight ahead, blindfolds himself. The photographer stands facing the male nude.

About one minute passes and the naked man begins to run his hands across his chest and down over his penis. He systematically repeats variations of this movement, until it starts to become a dance.

After about two minutes the photographer begins to photograph the naked man. The male nude begins to become visibly aroused. The naked man continues to repeat his movements while the photographer takes pictures of him. The pianist continues to play throughout.

With each photograph the photographer takes, she drops it on the ground. Each picture is taken about one minute apart from the next. Between each photograph taken the photographer changes the location she is standing in, watches the naked man, and then takes another picture.

This goes on for roughly twelve minutes until the pianist stops playing. At this point the photographer stops taking pictures, the naked man stops moving, and they all exit the room.

